Marble countertops are a must-have for many homeowners. However, when evaluating your countertop options, it is never a great idea to become fixated on only one material. While marble is a terrific natural stone, there are plenty of marble alternatives you can find on the market. Whether natural or engineered stone, these alternatives can give you the marble look with increased strength and durability. From a range of colors to various types of veining, there are many great alternatives to marble for your home. This guide will help you narrow down which of these alternative countertop materials are the best.

Which Materials Are the Best Substitutes for Marble?

Although there are other products that can replicate the look of marble, such as cultured marble, three of the best alternatives you can find to marble are quartz, quartzite and granite. The following is an analysis of all three countertop materials, as well as specific types of those materials.

Quartz

Quartz countertops are engineered stone surfaces that are created by combining roughly 90 percent ground natural quartz with around 10 percent polyresin. The exact percentages that make up the material will slightly differ based on different brands (Caesarstone, Silestone, Cambria, etc.). Because quartz surfaces are manufactured, they are non-porous, and will not require the sealing that marble and other natural stones do. These beautiful surfaces are low maintenance, stain resistant and come in many different options that resemble the look of marble. The following are the best quartz alternatives to marble.
